INTEREST OF AMICI

State and local jurisdictions like Amici bear primary responsibility for ensuring the safety and well-being of their residents and communities. This principle is neither novel nor controversial; indeed, it lies at the core of our federalist system of government. See, e.g., Hillsborough Cnty. v. Automated Med. Labs., Inc., 471 U.S. 707, 719 (1985) (Residents’ health and safety are “primarily, and historically, a matter of local concern.”). In exercising that sovereign duty to promote public safety, local governments—including Amici, which comprise 146 cities, counties, and elected officials from across the United States—have adopted laws and policies reflecting their careful judgment of what practices best serve their communities.

In this litigation and in other litigation across the country, the federal government seeks to upset that well-established principle, attacking local policies that limit the entanglement of local law enforcement with federal immigration officers. The State of Illinois’s, City of Chicago’s, and Cook County’s challenged policies manifest a commitment to integrating immigrants into the community and promoting public safety, public health, and a robust economy. Amici share the goal of protecting the well-being of all residents and offer a critical perspective on how policies like those challenged in this case do just that.

ARGUMENT

The authority of local governments to make their own policy decisions about the health and safety of their communities is a fundamental feature of our constitutional system. Gonzales v. Oregon, 546 U.S. 243, 270 (2006) (quoting Medtronic, Inc. v. Lohr, 518 U.S. 470, 475 (1996)) (“[The] structure and limitations of federalism . . . allow the States ‘great latitude under their police powers to legislate as to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons.’”). As Amici well know, Appellees’ decisions to adopt policies limiting entanglement with federal immigration enforcement are not only authorized as a matter of constitutional design; they are also good policy. Extensive research shows that jurisdictions adopting similar policies—in which scarce local law enforcement resources are allocated to the investigation of crimes, rather than the enforcement of federal civil immigration laws—have safer, healthier, and more economically resilient communities.

I. So-Called Sanctuary Policies¹ Promote Public Safety.

As an initial matter, the Trump Administration's repeated attempts to characterize immigrant communities as threats to public safety are simply unsupported by the evidence. In fact, immigrant communities are statistically less likely to commit crime than U.S.-born citizens. Specifically, U.S.-born citizens are twice as likely as undocumented immigrants to be arrested for violent crimes² and four times as likely to be arrested for property crimes.³ They are also significantly more likely to be incarcerated than immigrants, documented or not.⁴ Is it thus unsurprising that increasing removals does not lower crime rates.⁵

In any event, and as many Amici have explained in litigation across the country, so-called sanctuary policies, like those challenged here, make communities safer. Any argument to the contrary is belied by extensive social science research amassed over the past several decades, which confirms that such policies either have no statistical effect on crime rates⁶ or result in lower crime rates⁷—particularly for violent crimes like robbery, assault, and homicide.⁸ Indeed according to one estimate, because sanctuary policies decrease violent crime, non-sanctuary jurisdictions across the country could reduce crime-related costs by $3.28 billion per year if they adopted such policies.⁹ In part, that is because one of the most important factors in a crime being “cleared,” or solved, is the willingness of witnesses to share information with the police.¹⁰ Local law enforcement thus relies on building trust with the communities they protect—a foundational principle of community policing that encourages cooperation with law enforcement.¹¹ Policies that make it more difficult for the police to maintain the trust of all community members, including immigrant populations, increase the likelihood that crimes go unreported, unsolved, or unprosecuted.

Indeed, extensive studies show that immigrants who fear removal for themselves or members of their communities are less likely to cooperate with local law enforcement. For example, a 2021 survey found that, in jurisdictions where local police coordinate with the federal government to enforce federal immigration laws, undocumented immigrants are less likely to trust that law enforcement will keep them or their communities safe; less likely to believe law enforcement will protect witness confidentiality; and less likely to think law enforcement will protect the rights of all people equally, even those who are undocumented.¹²

And the problem is not just a generalized skepticism about police. Rather, that skepticism manifests itself in ways that make entire communities less safe: through decreased reporting of crime and decreased cooperation from victims and witnesses with law enforcement during their investigation and prosecution of crime. For example, one study found that increased information sharing between local police and federal immigration authorities reduced Hispanics' crime reporting rate by 30 percent and increased their crime victimization rate by 16 percent.¹³ Similarly, a nationwide survey of Latinas found that, regardless of immigration status, respondents who reported a greater fear of removal for themselves, a family member, or a close friend were less likely to report being a victim of a violent crime to the police.¹⁴ Other studies show that undocumented victims of domestic violence, most of whom are women, are less likely to report abuse to authorities than documented or non-immigrant women because of fear of immigration consequences, among other reasons.¹⁵ And beyond decreased reporting, law enforcement officers themselves have reported that fear of removal interferes with victim cooperation in prosecutions.¹⁶

Many Amici communities have adopted policies, like those challenged here, in furtherance of what the evidence overwhelmingly shows: that decreased fear of immigration enforcement in local communities by local law enforcement increases public safety overall. Indeed, a longitudinal study examining crime reporting trends from 1980 to 2004 found that Latino victims of violent crimes were 23 percent more likely to come forward and seek police assistance after their jurisdiction adopted a so-called sanctuary policy.¹⁷

The federal government seeks to undermine those efforts through its immigration enforcement policies and harmful rhetoric, which directly deter immigrants from cooperating with or seeking help from local law enforcement. In fact, in a survey conducted to assess sentiment among the Latino community last year, 35 percent of Latino parent-respondents said they might avoid reporting a crime to the police.¹⁸ That mirrors a similar survey, conducted in in 2017 (the first year of the first Trump Administration), in which almost 30 percent of participants (members of Latino immigrant communities) said they “very often” or

“always” avoided contact with police; 39.4 percent avoided medical care, police, and services; and 47.6 percent warned their children to stay away from authorities.¹⁹

State and local law enforcement agencies are also concerned. For example, in May 2025 in La Vergne, Tennessee, a six-month-old baby died after being found unresponsive where the baby’s caretaker reported being afraid to call 911 due to his immigration status.²⁰ The police chief, addressing a community town hall, acknowledged that “there are communities in La Vergne that are losing trust in law enforcement in this country right now, and it’s going to make our job very difficult.”²¹ These concerns were echoed in an April 2025 report detailing the experiences of five police leaders facing difficulty maintaining the trust of immigrant communities amid increased ICE activity—trust the report described as “essential to learning about crimes in their jurisdictions and to identifying and apprehending offenders.”²²

At bottom, policies like those challenged here make communities safer. They are grounded not in extremist rhetoric, but in evidence-based and rational decision-making and are eminently within the domain of the police power maintained by State and local governments, including many Amici communities.

II. So-Called Sanctuary Policies Promote Economic Well-Being.

So-called sanctuary policies are not only essential for advancing public safety—they also preserve scarce local resources and promote vibrant local economies. That is because “[w]hen local law enforcement focuses on keeping communities safe, rather than becoming entangled in federal immigration enforcement efforts, . . . community members stay more engaged in the local economy.”²³ According to one study, cities and municipalities that adopt policies like those challenged in this case have higher median household incomes, less poverty, and less reliance on public assistance.²⁴ They also have higher labor force participation, higher employment-to-population ratios, and lower unemployment.²⁵ The study found that, on average, median household income is $4,353 higher in counties with so-called sanctuary policies than in counties without such policies.²⁶

It should come as no surprise that communities with strong immigrant presence have healthy economies, given that immigrants are key contributors to the labor force across sectors. For one thing, immigrants are statistically more likely to work than native residents.²⁷ Indeed, one report found that between 2010 and 2018, immigrants and their U.S.-born children represented 83 percent of workforce growth.²⁸ The report projected that through 2035, all new growth in the working-age population of the U.S. would come from immigrants and their children.²⁹ Immigrants also start businesses at far higher rates than the U.S. population overall.³⁰ In 2023, there were over 3.8 million immigrant entrepreneurs, generating $116.2 billion in business income and creating millions of jobs.³¹ A 2024 American Immigration Council report found that a stunning 46 percent of Fortune 500 companies were founded by immigrants or the children of immigrants.³² spending power, and help build housing wealth. In 2023, immigrant tax contributions amounted to more than $650 billion, and the collective spending power of immigrant households was $1.7 trillion.³³ Even undocumented immigrants generate tax revenue—indeed, often more than similarly situated U.S. citizens—funding programs like Social Security and Medicare that they themselves are barred from accessing.³⁴ An analysis by the National Bureau of Economic Research estimated that unauthorized workers contribute three percent of private sector GDP annually, which amounts to close to $5 trillion over a 10-year period.³⁵ Immigrants also build housing wealth, often moving into neighborhoods in decline and restoring them, thereby raising property values and making them more attractive to other U.S. residents.³⁶

But when immigrants and their families fear indiscriminate immigration enforcement, it is more difficult for them to participate fully in the economy. Recent targeting of work sites by ICE illustrates the problem, showing how heightened fear of enforcement can disrupt local economies. A CNN story in June 2025 reported on a meat production plant that was left operating at 30 percent capacity after an immigration enforcement action removed dozens of workers.³⁷ In Los Angeles, a spate of ICE raids has caused a slump in the restaurant industry, with fewer diners visiting restaurants and more workers calling out.³⁸ Leaders in hospitality,³⁹ childcare,⁴⁰ and construction⁴¹ sectors also project workforce shortages due to increased immigration enforcement actions.

The decision by local governments to limit entanglement with federal immigration enforcement reflects the recognition that their immigrant populations are best able to contribute to economic growth and a thriving community without the fear of indiscriminate enforcement hanging over their heads. That choice is eminently reasonable, and it is their choice to make, see infra.

III. So-Called Sanctuary Policies Promote Health and Welfare.

Entanglement with federal immigration enforcement also threatens the health of communities. It contributes directly to decreased health by stoking an atmosphere of fear and chaos and increasing stress country, social workers, doctors, and medical professionals have seen upticks in patient anxiety, appointment no-shows, and reluctance from immigrants to access medical resources—including emergency care.⁴⁵ A July 2025 Associated Press report found that in the Rio Grande Valley, where health outcomes were already worse than the national average, increased immigration enforcement activity has caused many to skip medical appointments, fail to pick up prescriptions, and even refuse to sign their children up for health insurance.⁴⁶

When this happens, the overall impact is not limited to immigrants; it affects entire communities. As the American Public Health Association notes, “[t]he health of the nation cannot be upheld, promoted, or protected when our immigrant and refugee communities are in fear of being detained and deported.”⁴⁷ That is at least in part because when immigrants are reluctant to seek out healthcare for communicable diseases, it is more likely that such diseases will spread to others, including those outside of immigrant communities.⁴⁸ For example, a study found that tuberculosis outbreaks are more likely when fear of immigration enforcement deters immigrants from accessing healthcare.⁴⁹

But policies like those challenged in this case can mitigate the negative impact that fear of immigration enforcement would otherwise have on public health.⁵⁰ As Santa Clara County Executive James R. Williams has explained, these policies “promote community members’

What is happening here is a full-scale repeat of precisely the same arguments that the Trump Administration pressed and lost in its first go-around. They offer nothing new, nothing novel, nothing to distinguish Constitution, which prevents Congress from “strong arm[ing]” local governments “into doing its bidding.” Ocean, 475 F. Supp. 3d at 381 (rejecting the same arguments raised in this case); Murphy v. Nat’l Collegiate Athletic Ass’n, 584 U.S. 453, 474 (2018) (“A more direct affront to state sovereignty is not easy to imagine” than in a federal law that “dictates what a state legislature may and may not do.”). The Trump Administration thus lacks any legal basis for the claims it presses in this case, or indeed to support its more general endeavor to usurp state and local governments to carry out offensive and dangerous immigration policy, see United States v. New York, No. 25 Civ. 744, 2025 WL 3205011, at *13, *16–20 (N.D.N.Y. Nov. 17, 2025) (dismissing similar claims).

State and local governments like Amici are duty-bound to promote the safety and welfare of all residents in their communities, regardless of immigration status. In enacting the challenged policies, the State of Illinois, City of Chicago, and Cook County lawfully exercised their sovereign duty to do just that.

CONCLUSION

Amici support Appellees and respectfully submit that the district court’s decision should be affirmed.
